Not far from the water's edge he saw a cottage, and looking through the walls into such a poor room, the blossom saw on a low bed, a sick boy. His head seemed too large for his body, his limbs little and short. He turned wearily on his pillow.

"Mother," said he, "what is that—the hallooing and laughing?"
The sweet-faced mother turned to the window and replied: "The boya are playing ball on the meadow, darling."

"I thought so," and a patient smile passed over the boy's face.

Then the scene changed and bean-blossom saw at his feet the little lame boy reaching those thin hands toward him, and exclaiming "Oh the lovely flowers; if I could reach them." He stretched his arms in the air and called, "Come down, little flower come down." Robbie tried, and begged the breeze to help him, but if only tossed him higher. Would no one lift him down to the helpless little bey? Who is that strong, handsome lad near by?

"Help, me down," cried, the blossom.

"Give it to me," begged little Jem. But the boy answered, "I'an too tired. It is too warm," and flung himself on the grass for a nap. Little Jem covered his face with his hands and sobbed; the bean-blossom also wept. As it sobbed and cried, it heard grandma calling, "Robbie," and to, he was a boy again, on the grass under the bean-vine, with grandma leaning over him and laughing. He jumped up, and as he filled his hands with flowers told all about it, and said, "Oh, grandma, Fm so glad I'm a boy again." Robbie went down and stayed with little Jem all the afternoon, and never again did he say, "I am too tired with my own pleasures to make others happy."—N. Y. Tribune.
